There once was a time when we used to purchase a single software package to cover all our photo needs. That is an era long passed, however, and we have moved on to one of the current crop of photo packages. Whether Adobe's Creative Cloud all-in-one tool is enough for those of you who prioritize speed and simplicity, is of course up to you to decide. I do think that for most of us, that decision is made for us, because this is a tool that will usher beginners and advanced users alike into a new era of photo editing. Adobe used to be a big part of that. That's not the case anymore, and my guess is that many users realign themselves with competing solutions. It is sports, and it's a very fairly one, that I'm most interested in. I appreciate that the Speedgrade process is very smart in terms of where it directs our photo editing. When it comes to our friends at Kodak, however, I question the nature of their recent "acquisition". Since the acquisition of Kodak's imaging capabilities, Adobe has been refining its cameras tool. I have no idea whether Kodak's mission was ever truly realized by Kodak or whether it was just a way to fuel a management buyout. All I know is that the new camera tool feels livelier and more functional than before. It's a smart idea to group similar images. Thanks to the appropriate use of Smart Cropping, the Merge to HDR feature organizes images into groups of similar exposures to facilitate further edits. Of course, you can continue to group similar photos manually in the Photo Bin. And if you pull a group of photos from a different set of folders, all the images in that set are treated as a single group. I like this idea and I think that we'll see many photographers using this tool (even including myself) in this way. When you shoot in raw, auto exposure bracketing is hard to beat. It's simply a super way to consolidate your raw image sets, and it's an awesome way to save raw file processing time. If you find yourself using that feature, you may want to create a second Smart Group, perhaps using a different starting point for each set of photos.

We now have an entire app economy. In this post I'll talk about why mobile application design matters, and how you can make something valuable. And hopefully I'll make you hungry for some of these apps. Mobile applications are what we call user-facing applications. They are the kind of apps that users at most care about. It is the mobile development landscape that is the most interesting to use. On android apps, things are a little easier. Android has a higher market share, and Google owns the Android platform. That means that Android is more than just a platform, it is also a platform for Android apps. Even though it does sometimes feel like a monolithic platform. However, the iOS app adaption is pretty massive. Apple has succeeded in building a platform that makes iOS the best mobile operating system. In iOS one starts with the UI, and then moves into the technology of the system. That's where users care. It's the only reason to create a mobile iOS app. Think of how many phone apps exist for managing credit cards, or creating f 933d7f57e6

- Layer Comps save time and effort of zoom-ins, crops and rotations, and allows designers to compare and create similar composition for overlay on their layered photos, logos or any other pictures.
- The Clone tool can quickly copy and paste a selection or adjust style and color of area or a whole layer, allowing designers to quickly insert the same effect on any image and quickly share copied or layered images.

- Raster-to-Vector conversion allows designers to export design elements—like paths, ellipse, lines or polylines—as high-quality vector graphics to Photoshop, Illustrator, InDesign and Web browsers
