Regards! Arsenij Nice review with some good points and with a few wrong points. The main advantage of Photoshop is it's handling of the images. It's a tool boosting your dexterity, and letting you manipulate, sort, color set and simplify massive amounts of data to which Photoshop can handle. However, it's still very complicated, and works best when you can get real live as opposed to pre-cooked models. I'm thinking you may be able to use an LRTagger or other program for this and import the lists. I've had good luck with the Content Aware tools. I'm working on a program called "The Internet of Things" which will just make something like a feed of all the things an object is near, and it will make a curve of a persons relating to that thing. The entire equation is on the internet. So if the user starts the environment then a feed of things the user is near is created for everyone to see and interact with as the user moves. it uses tagger scanning, but let's it "filter" things the user is near. But it's all about the right algorithms.
